

12 November 2008

Excellency,

The forthcoming G20 Summit on Financial Markets and the World Economy is being convened at a moment of deep concern for the world economy. Global growth projections are being revised downward and we remain in the danger zone. We also face the prospect of an unprecedented global human crisis due to a worldwide weakening of economic activity on a scale that we have not seen for decades. The poorest and most vulnerable everywhere, but particularly in the developing countries, will be the most affected by such a major growth slowdown. Hopefully the G20 meeting this weekend will lay the groundwork for reforms that will prevent a reoccurrence of the kind of crisis we are living through today. But we need most of all to join forces to take immediate action to prevent the financial crisis from becoming a human tragedy. We must deal with the “fierce urgency of now”, to use the unforgettable words of Martin Luther King. If hundreds of millions of people lose their livelihoods, and their hopes for the future are dashed because of a crisis they have absolutely no responsibility for, the human crisis will not remain just economic. It will assume new and difficult political and security dimensions that could overwhelm the ones we are already facing.

All over the world I see, as Secretary-General of the United Nations, how political, security, environmental and economic problems are interlinked. The Millennium Declaration adopted at the historic Millennium Summit of the United Nations eight years ago, gave new hope to the young and old that by joining forces in a common endeavour we could make poverty history. Globalization, the expansion of trade and foreign investment, remittances, the spread of knowledge and support to the neediest through official development assistance, as well as through private giving, were all counted on to help us reach our common goal of much greater sustainable human development and human security. Today's crisis threatens human progress and thereby the very foundations for an open and dynamic world economy and inclusive globalization.

His Excellency
Mr. Felipe Calderón Hinojosa
President of the United States of Mexico
Mexico

This crisis also shows us how interdependent we have all become, and how we can be both harmed and helped by the policies of others. This is true for climate change, one of my own important priorities. It is true for financial markets, food, energy, trade, employment and of course also for threats outside the narrow economic realm, such as infectious disease.

Recognizing this interdependence and the gravity of the threats we face, I strongly welcome the opportunity of the G20 Summit and the resolve to act that it signifies. There will be different perspectives on the specific economic and financial policies we need to pursue, and the institutional aspects of the reform that is needed. These details will have to be worked on. But it is essential that the G20 meeting signals an unmistakable common resolve to overcome the crisis, to act together, to act with urgency and to show solidarity towards the neediest. An important way of doing this will be by meeting existing commitments on aid, so that progress towards the Millennium Development Goals can be maintained.

On Monday, in an informal session of the General Assembly, I listened carefully to some of the concerns of the member states present, and heard about the dire problems they face because of the crisis. Some of these countries – powerful developed economies as well as emerging engines of growth – will be present at Saturday's meeting. But over 170 countries will not be present at the table, and they also face grave difficulties. Whether these are developed or developing countries, their voices too should count and I will try to bring these voices to our meeting. During times like these, multilateral action does require that those who have the greatest means take the lead, and meet in informal and flexible ways. Such meetings can help trigger decisive progress that would be otherwise difficult to organize. At the same time, legitimacy and long-term effectiveness require that fully inclusive governance mechanisms function in conformance with international agreements. As Secretary-General of the United Nations, I look forward to working closely with the President of the World Bank, the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, as well as others in facilitating an inclusive approach to the institutional reforms we have to undertake because such reforms cannot be restricted to financial sector regulation alone. They must deal with the broader challenges for human security, including climate change, conflict prevention and the eradication of poverty.

On climate change, we face a unique opportunity. The economic crisis requires an increase in public investments to counteract falling private demand. Many countries are enacting welcome fiscal stimulus packages. To limit climate change successfully we will need to invest in new technologies, in green jobs, and in helping the world cope with the changes that are already inevitable. Targeting a substantial part of the needed public spending to these needs will help fight the short term crisis, while laying the foundation for the long-term sustainability of economic growth.

Another area of great importance relates to trade. The lesson of the 1930s is that a spiral of protectionism can deepen a recession. While individual countries may think that restricting trade can help protect jobs, it is more than a truism that one country's imports are another country's exports and restricting imports necessarily restricts exports. Far from helping employment, protectionism undermines jobs in the aggregate. An early resolution of the issues holding up the Doha trade round would be a great contribution to overcoming the crisis. Freer trade must of course rest on the agreed principles of common but differentiated treatment, including capacity building and aid-for-trade support for the least developed countries.

It is my firm belief that these broad challenges can only be met through a reinvigorated and inclusive multilateralism: one that is fair, flexible and responsive. A new form of cooperation is needed, open to initiatives from groups of countries working together, and with leaders coming from all quarters. The United Nations has much to contribute and remains the anchor of such a system.

The next few months will be crucial. Many of us will meet again in two weeks time in Doha to review progress on financing for development. In December, climate change negotiators will come together in Poznan, Poland.

In human affairs, crisis is also often a time of opportunity. Misfortune can give rise to fortune. If the world rises to the challenge, overcomes the immediate crisis and builds a stronger multilateralism for the twenty-first century, this first meeting of leaders of the G20 will be a milestone that will be remembered.

Please accept, Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration.

BAN Ki-moon

THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

12 November 2008

Excellency,

The forthcoming G20 Summit on Financial Markets and the World Economy is being convened at a moment of deep concern for the world economy. Global growth projections are being revised downward and we remain in the danger zone. We also face the prospect of an unprecedented global human crisis due to a worldwide weakening of economic activity on a scale that we have not seen for decades. The poorest and most vulnerable everywhere, but particularly in the developing countries, will be the most affected by such a major growth slowdown. Hopefully the G20 meeting this weekend will lay the groundwork for reforms that will prevent a reoccurrence of the kind of crisis we are living through today. But we need most of all to join forces to take immediate action to prevent the financial crisis from becoming a human tragedy. We must deal with the “fierce urgency of now”, to use the unforgettable words of Martin Luther King. If hundreds of millions of people lose their livelihoods, and their hopes for the future are dashed because of a crisis they have absolutely no responsibility for, the human crisis will not remain just economic. It will assume new and difficult political and security dimensions that could overwhelm the ones we are already facing.

All over the world I see, as Secretary-General of the United Nations, how political, security, environmental and economic problems are interlinked. The Millennium Declaration adopted at the historic Millennium Summit of the United Nations eight years ago, gave new hope to the young and old that by joining forces in a common endeavour we could make poverty history. Globalization, the expansion of trade and foreign investment, remittances, the spread of knowledge and support to the neediest through official development assistance, as well as through private giving, were all counted on to help us reach our common goal of much greater sustainable human development and human security. Today’s crisis threatens human progress and thereby the very foundations for an open and dynamic world economy and inclusive globalization.

His Excellency
Mr. José Manuel Barroso
President of the European Commission
Brussels

This crisis also shows us how interdependent we have all become, and how we can be both harmed and helped by the policies of others. This is true for climate change, one of my own important priorities. It is true for financial markets, food, energy, trade, employment and of course also for threats outside the narrow economic realm, such as infectious disease.

Recognizing this interdependence and the gravity of the threats we face, I strongly welcome the opportunity of the G20 Summit and the resolve to act that it signifies. There will be different perspectives on the specific economic and financial policies we need to pursue, and the institutional aspects of the reform that is needed. These details will have to be worked on. But it is essential that the G20 meeting signals an unmistakable common resolve to overcome the crisis, to act together, to act with urgency and to show solidarity towards the neediest. An important way of doing this will be by meeting existing commitments on aid, so that progress towards the Millennium Development Goals can be maintained.

On Monday, in an informal session of the General Assembly, I listened carefully to some of the concerns of the member states present, and heard about the dire problems they face because of the crisis. Some of these countries – powerful developed economies as well as emerging engines of growth – will be present at Saturday's meeting. But over 170 countries will not be present at the table, and they also face grave difficulties. Whether these are developed or developing countries, their voices too should count and I will try to bring these voices to our meeting. During times like these, multilateral action does require that those who have the greatest means take the lead, and meet in informal and flexible ways. Such meetings can help trigger decisive progress that would be otherwise difficult to organize. At the same time, legitimacy and long-term effectiveness require that fully inclusive governance mechanisms function in conformance with international agreements. As Secretary-General of the United Nations, I look forward to working closely with the President of the World Bank, the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, as well as others in facilitating an inclusive approach to the institutional reforms we have to undertake because such reforms cannot be restricted to financial sector regulation alone. They must deal with the broader challenges for human security, including climate change, conflict prevention and the eradication of poverty.

On climate change, we face a unique opportunity. The economic crisis requires an increase in public investments to counteract falling private demand. Many countries are enacting welcome fiscal stimulus packages. To limit climate change successfully we will need to invest in new technologies, in green jobs, and in helping the world cope with the changes that are already inevitable. Targeting a substantial part of the needed public spending to these needs will help fight the short term crisis, while laying the foundation for the long-term sustainability of economic growth.

Another area of great importance relates to trade. The lesson of the 1930s is that a spiral of protectionism can deepen a recession. While individual countries may think that restricting trade can help protect jobs, it is more than a truism that one country's imports are another country's exports and restricting imports necessarily restricts exports. Far from helping employment, protectionism undermines jobs in the aggregate. An early resolution of the issues holding up the Doha trade round would be a great contribution to overcoming the crisis. Freer trade must of course rest on the agreed principles of common but differentiated treatment, including capacity building and aid-for-trade support for the least developed countries.

It is my firm belief that these broad challenges can only be met through a reinvigorated and inclusive multilateralism: one that is fair, flexible and responsive. A new form of cooperation is needed, open to initiatives from groups of countries working together, and with leaders coming from all quarters. The United Nations has much to contribute and remains the anchor of such a system.

The next few months will be crucial. Many of us will meet again in two weeks time in Doha to review progress on financing for development. In December, climate change negotiators will come together in Poznan, Poland.

In human affairs, crisis is also often a time of opportunity. Misfortune can give rise to fortune. If the world rises to the challenge, overcomes the immediate crisis and builds a stronger multilateralism for the twenty-first century, this first meeting of leaders of the G20 will be a milestone that will be remembered.

Please accept, Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration.

BAN Ki-moon

THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

12 November 2008

Dear Mr. Strauss-Kahn,

The forthcoming G20 Summit on Financial Markets and the World Economy is being convened at a moment of deep concern for the world economy. Global growth projections are being revised downward and we remain in the danger zone. We also face the prospect of an unprecedented global human crisis due to a worldwide weakening of economic activity on a scale that we have not seen for decades. The poorest and most vulnerable everywhere, but particularly in the developing countries, will be the most affected by such a major growth slowdown. Hopefully the G20 meeting this weekend will lay the groundwork for reforms that will prevent a reoccurrence of the kind of crisis we are living through today. But we need most of all to join forces to take immediate action to prevent the financial crisis from becoming a human tragedy. We must deal with the "fierce urgency of now", to use the unforgettable words of Martin Luther King. If hundreds of millions of people lose their livelihoods, and their hopes for the future are dashed because of a crisis they have absolutely no responsibility for, the human crisis will not remain just economic. It will assume new and difficult political and security dimensions that could overwhelm the ones we are already facing.

All over the world I see, as Secretary-General of the United Nations, how political, security, environmental and economic problems are interlinked. The Millennium Declaration adopted at the historic Millennium Summit of the United Nations eight years ago, gave new hope to the young and old that by joining forces in a common endeavour we could make poverty history. Globalization, the expansion of trade and foreign investment, remittances, the spread of knowledge and support to the neediest through official development assistance, as well as through private giving, were all counted on to help us reach our common goal of much greater sustainable human development and human security. Today's crisis threatens human progress and thereby the very foundations for an open and dynamic world economy and inclusive globalization.

Mr. Dominique Strauss-Kahn
Managing Director
International Monetary Fund
Washington, D.C.

This crisis also shows us how interdependent we have all become, and how we can be both harmed and helped by the policies of others. This is true for climate change, one of my own important priorities. It is true for financial markets, food, energy, trade, employment and of course also for threats outside the narrow economic realm, such as infectious disease.

Recognizing this interdependence and the gravity of the threats we face, I strongly welcome the opportunity of the G20 Summit and the resolve to act that it signifies. There will be different perspectives on the specific economic and financial policies we need to pursue, and the institutional aspects of the reform that is needed. These details will have to be worked on. But it is essential that the G20 meeting signals an unmistakable common resolve to overcome the crisis, to act together, to act with urgency and to show solidarity towards the neediest. An important way of doing this will be by meeting existing commitments on aid, so that progress towards the Millennium Development Goals can be maintained.

On Monday, in an informal session of the General Assembly, I listened carefully to some of the concerns of the member states present, and heard about the dire problems they face because of the crisis. Some of these countries – powerful developed economies as well as emerging engines of growth – will be present at Saturday's meeting. But over 170 countries will not be present at the table, and they also face grave difficulties. Whether these are developed or developing countries, their voices too should count and I will try to bring these voices to our meeting. During times like these, multilateral action does require that those who have the greatest means take the lead, and meet in informal and flexible ways. Such meetings can help trigger decisive progress that would be otherwise difficult to organize. At the same time, legitimacy and long-term effectiveness require that fully inclusive governance mechanisms function in conformance with international agreements. As Secretary-General of the United Nations, I look forward to working closely with the President of the World Bank, the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, as well as others in facilitating an inclusive approach to the institutional reforms we have to undertake because such reforms cannot be restricted to financial sector regulation alone. They must deal with the broader challenges for human security, including climate change, conflict prevention and the eradication of poverty.

On climate change, we face a unique opportunity. The economic crisis requires an increase in public investments to counteract falling private demand. Many countries are enacting welcome fiscal stimulus packages. To limit climate change successfully we will need to invest in new technologies, in green jobs, and in helping the world cope with the changes that are already inevitable. Targeting a substantial part of the needed public spending to these needs will help fight the short term crisis, while laying the foundation for the long-term sustainability of economic growth.

Another area of great importance relates to trade. The lesson of the 1930s is that a spiral of protectionism can deepen a recession. While individual countries may think that restricting trade can help protect jobs, it is more than a truism that one country's imports are another country's exports and restricting imports necessarily restricts exports. Far from helping employment, protectionism undermines jobs in the aggregate. An early resolution of the issues holding up the Doha trade round would be a great contribution to overcoming the crisis. Freer trade must of course rest on the agreed principles of common but differentiated treatment, including capacity building and aid-for-trade support for the least developed countries.

It is my firm belief that these broad challenges can only be met through a reinvigorated and inclusive multilateralism: one that is fair, flexible and responsive. A new form of cooperation is needed, open to initiatives from groups of countries working together, and with leaders coming from all quarters. The United Nations has much to contribute and remains the anchor of such a system.

The next few months will be crucial. Many of us will meet again in two weeks time in Doha to review progress on financing for development. In December, climate change negotiators will come together in Poznan, Poland.

In human affairs, crisis is also often a time of opportunity. Misfortune can give rise to fortune. If the world rises to the challenge, overcomes the immediate crisis and builds a stronger multilateralism for the twenty-first century, this first meeting of leaders of the G20 will be a milestone that will be remembered.

Yours sincerely,

A handwritten signature in black ink, reading "Ki-moon Ban". The signature is fluid and cursive, with the first name "Ki" and last name "Ban" being more prominent than the middle name "moon".

BAN Ki-moon

THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

12 November 2008

Dear Mr. Zoellick,

The forthcoming G20 Summit on Financial Markets and the World Economy is being convened at a moment of deep concern for the world economy. Global growth projections are being revised downward and we remain in the danger zone. We also face the prospect of an unprecedented global human crisis due to a worldwide weakening of economic activity on a scale that we have not seen for decades. The poorest and most vulnerable everywhere, but particularly in the developing countries, will be the most affected by such a major growth slowdown. Hopefully the G20 meeting this weekend will lay the groundwork for reforms that will prevent a reoccurrence of the kind of crisis we are living through today. But we need most of all to join forces to take immediate action to prevent the financial crisis from becoming a human tragedy. We must deal with the “fierce urgency of now”, to use the unforgettable words of Martin Luther King. If hundreds of millions of people lose their livelihoods, and their hopes for the future are dashed because of a crisis they have absolutely no responsibility for, the human crisis will not remain just economic. It will assume new and difficult political and security dimensions that could overwhelm the ones we are already facing.

All over the world I see, as Secretary-General of the United Nations, how political, security, environmental and economic problems are interlinked. The Millennium Declaration adopted at the historic Millennium Summit of the United Nations eight years ago, gave new hope to the young and old that by joining forces in a common endeavour we could make poverty history. Globalization, the expansion of trade and foreign investment, remittances, the spread of knowledge and support to the neediest through official development assistance, as well as through private giving, were all counted on to help us reach our common goal of much greater sustainable human development and human security. Today’s crisis threatens human progress and thereby the very foundations for an open and dynamic world economy and inclusive globalization.

Mr. Robert B. Zoellick
President
World Bank
Washington, D.C.

This crisis also shows us how interdependent we have all become, and how we can be both harmed and helped by the policies of others. This is true for climate change, one of my own important priorities. It is true for financial markets, food, energy, trade, employment and of course also for threats outside the narrow economic realm, such as infectious disease.

Recognizing this interdependence and the gravity of the threats we face, I strongly welcome the opportunity of the G20 Summit and the resolve to act that it signifies. There will be different perspectives on the specific economic and financial policies we need to pursue, and the institutional aspects of the reform that is needed. These details will have to be worked on. But it is essential that the G20 meeting signals an unmistakable common resolve to overcome the crisis, to act together, to act with urgency and to show solidarity towards the neediest. An important way of doing this will be by meeting existing commitments on aid, so that progress towards the Millennium Development Goals can be maintained.

On Monday, in an informal session of the General Assembly, I listened carefully to some of the concerns of the member states present, and heard about the dire problems they face because of the crisis. Some of these countries – powerful developed economies as well as emerging engines of growth – will be present at Saturday's meeting. But over 170 countries will not be present at the table, and they also face grave difficulties. Whether these are developed or developing countries, their voices too should count and I will try to bring these voices to our meeting. During times like these, multilateral action does require that those who have the greatest means take the lead, and meet in informal and flexible ways. Such meetings can help trigger decisive progress that would be otherwise difficult to organize. At the same time, legitimacy and long-term effectiveness require that fully inclusive governance mechanisms function in conformance with international agreements. As Secretary-General of the United Nations, I look forward to working closely with the President of the World Bank, the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, as well as others in facilitating an inclusive approach to the institutional reforms we have to undertake because such reforms cannot be restricted to financial sector regulation alone. They must deal with the broader challenges for human security, including climate change, conflict prevention and the eradication of poverty.

On climate change, we face a unique opportunity. The economic crisis requires an increase in public investments to counteract falling private demand. Many countries are enacting welcome fiscal stimulus packages. To limit climate change successfully we will need to invest in new technologies, in green jobs, and in helping the world cope with the changes that are already inevitable. Targeting a substantial part of the needed public spending to these needs will help fight the short term crisis, while laying the foundation for the long-term sustainability of economic growth.

Another area of great importance relates to trade. The lesson of the 1930s is that a spiral of protectionism can deepen a recession. While individual countries may think that restricting trade can help protect jobs, it is more than a truism that one country's imports are another country's exports and restricting imports necessarily restricts exports. Far from helping employment, protectionism undermines jobs in the aggregate. An early resolution of the issues holding up the Doha trade round would be a great contribution to overcoming the crisis. Freer trade must of course rest on the agreed principles of common but differentiated treatment, including capacity building and aid-for-trade support for the least developed countries.

It is my firm belief that these broad challenges can only be met through a reinvigorated and inclusive multilateralism: one that is fair, flexible and responsive. A new form of cooperation is needed, open to initiatives from groups of countries working together, and with leaders coming from all quarters. The United Nations has much to contribute and remains the anchor of such a system.

The next few months will be crucial. Many of us will meet again in two weeks time in Doha to review progress on financing for development. In December, climate change negotiators will come together in Poznan, Poland.

In human affairs, crisis is also often a time of opportunity. Misfortune can give rise to fortune. If the world rises to the challenge, overcomes the immediate crisis and builds a stronger multilateralism for the twenty-first century, this first meeting of leaders of the G20 will be a milestone that will be remembered.

Yours sincerely,

BAN Ki-moon

THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

12 November 2008

Dear Mr. Draghi,

The forthcoming G20 Summit on Financial Markets and the World Economy is being convened at a moment of deep concern for the world economy. Global growth projections are being revised downward and we remain in the danger zone. We also face the prospect of an unprecedented global human crisis due to a worldwide weakening of economic activity on a scale that we have not seen for decades. The poorest and most vulnerable everywhere, but particularly in the developing countries, will be the most affected by such a major growth slowdown. Hopefully the G20 meeting this weekend will lay the groundwork for reforms that will prevent a reoccurrence of the kind of crisis we are living through today. But we need most of all to join forces to take immediate action to prevent the financial crisis from becoming a human tragedy. We must deal with the “fierce urgency of now”, to use the unforgettable words of Martin Luther King. If hundreds of millions of people lose their livelihoods, and their hopes for the future are dashed because of a crisis they have absolutely no responsibility for, the human crisis will not remain just economic. It will assume new and difficult political and security dimensions that could overwhelm the ones we are already facing.

All over the world I see, as Secretary-General of the United Nations, how political, security, environmental and economic problems are interlinked. The Millennium Declaration adopted at the historic Millennium Summit of the United Nations eight years ago, gave new hope to the young and old that by joining forces in a common endeavour we could make poverty history. Globalization, the expansion of trade and foreign investment, remittances, the spread of knowledge and support to the neediest through official development assistance, as well as through private giving, were all counted on to help us reach our common goal of much greater sustainable human development and human security. Today's crisis threatens human progress and thereby the very foundations for an open and dynamic world economy and inclusive globalization.

Mr. Mario Draghi
Chairman
Financial Stability Forum
Basel

This crisis also shows us how interdependent we have all become, and how we can be both harmed and helped by the policies of others. This is true for climate change, one of my own important priorities. It is true for financial markets, food, energy, trade, employment and of course also for threats outside the narrow economic realm, such as infectious disease.

Recognizing this interdependence and the gravity of the threats we face, I strongly welcome the opportunity of the G20 Summit and the resolve to act that it signifies. There will be different perspectives on the specific economic and financial policies we need to pursue, and the institutional aspects of the reform that is needed. These details will have to be worked on. But it is essential that the G20 meeting signals an unmistakable common resolve to overcome the crisis, to act together, to act with urgency and to show solidarity towards the neediest. An important way of doing this will be by meeting existing commitments on aid, so that progress towards the Millennium Development Goals can be maintained.

On Monday, in an informal session of the General Assembly, I listened carefully to some of the concerns of the member states present, and heard about the dire problems they face because of the crisis. Some of these countries – powerful developed economies as well as emerging engines of growth – will be present at Saturday's meeting. But over 170 countries will not be present at the table, and they also face grave difficulties. Whether these are developed or developing countries, their voices too should count and I will try to bring these voices to our meeting. During times like these, multilateral action does require that those who have the greatest means take the lead, and meet in informal and flexible ways. Such meetings can help trigger decisive progress that would be otherwise difficult to organize. At the same time, legitimacy and long-term effectiveness require that fully inclusive governance mechanisms function in conformance with international agreements. As Secretary-General of the United Nations, I look forward to working closely with the President of the World Bank, the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, as well as others in facilitating an inclusive approach to the institutional reforms we have to undertake because such reforms cannot be restricted to financial sector regulation alone. They must deal with the broader challenges for human security, including climate change, conflict prevention and the eradication of poverty.

On climate change, we face a unique opportunity. The economic crisis requires an increase in public investments to counteract falling private demand. Many countries are enacting welcome fiscal stimulus packages. To limit climate change successfully we will need to invest in new technologies, in green jobs, and in helping the world cope with the changes that are already inevitable. Targeting a substantial part of the needed public spending to these needs will help fight the short term crisis, while laying the foundation for the long-term sustainability of economic growth.

Another area of great importance relates to trade. The lesson of the 1930s is that a spiral of protectionism can deepen a recession. While individual countries may think that restricting trade can help protect jobs, it is more than a truism that one country's imports are another country's exports and restricting imports necessarily restricts exports. Far from helping employment, protectionism undermines jobs in the aggregate. An early resolution of the issues holding up the Doha trade round would be a great contribution to overcoming the crisis. Freer trade must of course rest on the agreed principles of common but differentiated treatment, including capacity building and aid-for-trade support for the least developed countries.

It is my firm belief that these broad challenges can only be met through a reinvigorated and inclusive multilateralism: one that is fair, flexible and responsive. A new form of cooperation is needed, open to initiatives from groups of countries working together, and with leaders coming from all quarters. The United Nations has much to contribute and remains the anchor of such a system.

The next few months will be crucial. Many of us will meet again in two weeks time in Doha to review progress on financing for development. In December, climate change negotiators will come together in Poznan, Poland.

In human affairs, crisis is also often a time of opportunity. Misfortune can give rise to fortune. If the world rises to the challenge, overcomes the immediate crisis and builds a stronger multilateralism for the twenty-first century, this first meeting of leaders of the G20 will be a milestone that will be remembered.

Yours sincerely,

A handwritten signature in black ink, reading "Ki Moon Ban". The signature is fluid and cursive, with the first name "Ki" and last name "Ban" being more prominent than the middle name "Moon".

BAN Ki-moon

Possible list of participants

Group of 20 members

Argentina
Australia
Brazil
Canada
China
France (EU Presidency)
Germany
India
Indonesia
Italy

Japan
Republic of Korea
Mexico
Russia
Saudi Arabia
South Africa
Turkey
United Kingdom
United States
European Commission

Additional 3 institutions

Financial Stability Forum
International Monetary Fund
World Bank

76

Graham

Anne-Marie
Beausejour/NY/UNO
13/11/2008 09:56 PM

To Elisabeth Weidmann/NY/UNO@UNHQ
cc bcc
Subject Fw: Re: Urgent: Approval for letter

here it is :0)

Ms. Anne-Marie Beausejour
Executive Office of the Secretary-General
United Nations
S-3840
tel (212) 963-9676
Fax (212) 963-1185
beausejoura@un.org

-----Forwarded by Anne-Marie Beausejour/NY/UNO on 11/13/2008 09:53PM -----

To: Paul Ladd/NY/UNO@UNHQ
From: Wonsoo Kim/NY/UNO
Date: 11/12/2008 10:11AM
cc: Anne-Marie Beausejour/NY/UNO@UNHQ
Subject: Re: Urgent: Approval for letter

Pls go ahead. Best.

Paul Ladd

----- Original Message -----

From: Paul Ladd
Sent: 12/11/2008 10:06 EST
To: Wonsoo Kim
Cc: Anne-Marie Beausejour
Subject: Urgent: Approval for letter

Mr. Kim

The letter from the SG to the G20 has been finalized and is being distributed. Please can we have your approval for the letter to be sent in English to all of the leaders (I understand that ordinarily it would be translated but our timeframe prevents that).

Thanks
Paul

Mr. Paul Ladd
Executive Office of the Secretary-General
United Nations Secretariat
Room S-3840B
New York, NY, 10017

phone: + 1 212 963 0387
email: ladd@un.org

